such as extreme seasonal variations, economic constraints, unhealthy and unsupportive social environments, and the like. In many cases, individuals overeat, suffer inordinate stress because of obesity, or eat the wrong foods with a high fat content. For the obese, the emphasis is placed on obtaining relief from the health problems often associated with a high body weight. The obese, on the other hand, may experience high levels of stress, or the desire to control their weight may serve as a psychological barometer of their general emotional health. Although conventional treatments, including behavioral therapy, may provide some control over an individual's weight, they have limited effectiveness as they depend on the individual's willingness to maintain a diet program and exercise regimen. Furthermore, conventional treatments for weight loss are not necessarily geared to the psychological health of the individual who chooses to follow the weight loss program. Thus, there is a need for a treatment which incorporates the psychological issues of the individual with a weight loss program.
